deponent (dɪ'pəʊnənt), a. and sb. [ad. L. dēpōnent-em, pr. pple. of depōnĕre (see prec.), spec. used by the late L. grammarians as in sense 1.]

A. adj. Gram. Of verbs: Passive or middle in form but active in meaning: originally a term of Latin Grammar.

Both form and meaning were originally reflexive (e.g. utor I serve myself, fruor I delight myself, proficiscor I put myself forward, etc.), as in the Middle Voice in Greek; as, however, in ordinary verbs the reflexive form had become a passive in Latin, these verbs were erroneously regarded as having laid aside or dropped a passive meaning, whence the name. In reality, what was laid aside, or lost sight of, was the reflexive sense.

Gram.* §433 A deponent verb is one which though exclusively passive or middle in its inflexions, has so entirely deponed or laid aside its original meaning, that it is used in all respects like a transitive or neuter verb of the active form. 1871 GOODWIN Grk. Gram. (1882) 80 Deponent verbs are those which have no active voice, but are used in the middle or passive forms with an active sense.

Gram.* (1892) 91 Deponents generally have the aorist and future of the middle form.

depot ('dɛpəʊ, dɪ'pəʊ, 'di:pəʊ). Also depôt, dépôt. [a. F. dépôt (depo), in OF. depost (14th c. in Littré and Hatzf.), (= It., Sp. deposito), ad. L. dēpositum: see DEPOSITUM, DEPOSIT, DEPOST, all forms of the same word.

As in the case of other words from modern French, the pronunciation varies widely. The French (depo), with short e and o and undefined stress, is foreign to English habits of utterance. The earlier English rendering, as shown by the dictionaries down to 1860–70, was, according to the French historical stress and quantity, or the English conception of it (cf. bureau, chateau, Tussaud), (di:'pəu), or, with a conscious effort to reproduce the first vowel in French, (der'pəu); these pronunciations were (1895) still heard, but the stress is now more usually on the first syllable, and the quantity of the o doubtful, giving ('dɛpəʊ, 'di:pəu), in England, ('di:pəʊ, 'deɪpəu), in U.S. (where the word is much more in popular use, and ('di:pot, di:'pot), are mentioned by Longfellow, Lowell, etc., as popular vulgarisms). The form ('dɛpəʊ) comes as near the French (depo) as English analogies admit. The earlier Eng. spelling omitted the accent-marks, and this is now usual; the spelling depôt belongs especially to the pronunciation (di:'pəʊ); the actual F. spelling dépôt goes together with the attempt to pronounce as in French.]

derring do, derring-do. pseudo-archaism. In 4–5 dorryng, (dorynge, duryng) don (do, to do), 5 dorynge do, 6 derrynge do, derring doe, 9 derring-do. The two words durring, dorryng, daring, vbl. sb. from durran, dorren to DARE, and don, do, pres. inf. of DO v., literally daring to do, which, by a chain of misunderstandings and errors, have come to be treated as a kind of substantive combination, taken to mean, Daring action or feats, 'desperate courage'.

The words come incidentally in their ordinary sense and construction followed by the object 'that' (= what, that which) in Chaucer's Troylus; whence, in an imitative passage by Lydgate, in an absolute construction more liable to misunderstanding; Lydgate's dorryng do was misprinted in the 16th c. editions (1513 and 1555) derrynge do, in which form it was picked up by Spenser and misconstrued as a subst. phrase, explained in the Glossary to the Sheph. Cal. as 'manhood and chevalrie'. Modern romantic writers, led by Sir W. Scott, have taken it from Spenser, printed it derring-do, and accentuated the erroneous use.

derye, var. DERE v. Obs., to hurt.

derzie, -y, varr. DURZEE.

des, obs. forms of DAIS, DICE.

des- in obs. words: see DEC-, DESC-, DESS-, DIS-.

des- prefix. Regular Romanic form of L. dis-, in OIt., Sp., Pg., Pr., OFr.; in mod.Fr. retained (as dés-) before a vowel or silent h (déshabillé), otherwise reduced to dé- (OF. descharge, mod. décharge). In some cases apparently representing a late L. de- ex-, for L. ex-. Partly from the frequent substitution of dis-, des-, for L. dē- in late L. and Romanic (see DE- prefix 6), partly through the phonetic reduction of des- to dé- in later French, the two prefixes have in that language largely fallen together under the mod.F. dé-. Early OF. words passed into English with the prefix in the form des- (descharge, ME. descharge); here it was sometimes, in conformity with later OF. pronunciation, reduced to de- (OF. desmembre, demembre, ME. demembre); but usually the s was retained, and the prefix at length changed back to the L. type dis- (discharge, dismembre, also spelt dys-) as was also done to some extent in French itself (descorde, now discorde).

In English, therefore, des- is merely the earlier form of DIS- in words from OF., e.g. desarm, desblame, descharge, desclaundre, descolour, desdain, desembogue, desere (= desheir), deserite (disherit), desgyse, deshonour, desinteressed, desjoyne, desjune, desmail, desmay, desmesure, desordein, desordere, desparage, desparple, despend, despense, despeople, desplay, desport, despreve (= disprove), despute, desray, destempre, desturb, destribute, etc. All these have a later form in DIS-, under which they are treated in this Dictionary. Only a few words became obsolete before dis- forms appeared. The prefix is exceptionally retained in descant, and it is occasionally found for DE- before a vowel, in chemical terms from modern French, as desoxalic, desoxybenzoin, †desoxydate. In despatch, modern var. of DISPATCH, the spelling des- is not historical, but originated in an 18th c. etymological error.

There are many words beginning with des- in which the s belongs to the root-word, and the prefix is de-, as descry, describe, descend, deserve, despair, despite, despoil, destroy. From confusion of these with words in which des- is the prefix, they also were in late ME. often spelt with dis- (discry, discribe, etc.). And, on the other hand, words in di- followed by s- were sometimes confused with words in dis- prefix, and so also written des- (destinct, destress, etc.). Both these errors have been corrected in the later orthography.

despot ('dɛspɔt). Also 6 dispotto, 7 despote. [a. OF. despot (14th c.), modF. despote, ad. Gr. δεσπότης (med.L. despota, -tus) master, lord, despot. In sense 1 partly after It. 'dispoto, in Florio de'spota, 'a lord, a lordlike governour'.]

1. Hist. A word which, in its Greek form, meant 'master' or 'lord' (e.g. of a household, of slaves), and was applied to a deity, and to the absolute ruler of a non-free people; in Byzantine times it was used of the Emperor, and, as representing Lat. magister, in various official titles, also as a form of address (= domine my lord) to the emperor, to bishops, and especially to patriarchs; from the time of Alexius Comnenus it was the formal title of princes of the imperial house; in the sense 'lord' or 'prince', it was borne, after the Turkish conquest, by the petty Christian rulers of dependent or tributary provinces, as the despots of the Morea or of Servia (= Servian hospodar). It was in this later application that the word was first known in the Western languages.

(In modern Greek, δεσπότης is the ordinary appellation of a bishop.)

(The modern use, which is usually hostile, according to Mason, quoted by Todd, came into prominence at the period of the French Revolution: 'the French revolutionists have been very liberal in conferring this title'.)

detent (dɪ'tɛnt), *sb.*¹ (Also 7 detton.) [a. F. détente, OF. destente (Froissart, 14th c.), deriv. of détendre 'to slacken, unstretch, undo', in OF. destendre, f. des-, L. dis- privative (cf. DE- 6) + tendre to stretch. (In L. distendĕre the prefix had a different force: see DISTEND.)

The earliest application of the word in French was to the destente of the arbalest or cross-bow, whereby the strained string was released and the bolt discharged; hence it was transferred to the analogous part in fire-arms. In English, the word seems to have been viewed as connected with L. dētinēre, dētent-, and so with detain, detention, and to have been modified in meaning accordingly. The fact that the same part which allows of the escape of that which is detained or held tense, is also often the means of detention, favoured this misconception of the word.]

2. Tennis. [= It. a due, F. à deux de jeu.] A term denoting that the two sides have each gained three points (called 40) in a game (or five games in a set), in which case two successive points (or games) must be gained in order to win the game (or set). (See ADVANTAGE sb. 2.) Also attrib. deuce-game (see quot. 1897); deuce-set, a set in which the sides are level, each having won five or more games.

deuce[2] (dju:s). colloq. or slang. Also 7 dewce, 7–8 deuse, 7–9 duce, 8 dewse, 9 dial. doose. [Prob. from LG. in 17th c.: cf. Ger. daus, LG. duus, used in precisely the same way, in the exclamatory der daus! was der daus...! LG. de duus! wat de duus!

The derivation of German daus is disputed: but there is reason to think that it is the same word as das daus = the DEUCE[1] at dice (where 'two' is the lowest and most unlucky throw), the gender being changed when the gambler's exclamation of vexation 'the deuce!' was metamorphosed into a personal expletive. A parallel development is known in Danish where the plural sb. pokker 'pocks, pox', has come to be felt as a singular, and to be taken for 'the devil', from its use in imprecations such as Gid pokker havde det! Would that a pox had that!, Pokker staa i det! A pox on that! Hvad pokker er det? What the pox (devil) is that? (See POX.) (On other conjectural identifications see Rev. A. L. Mayhew in Academy 30 Jan. 1892, p. 111.)]

a. Bad luck, plague, mischief; in imprecations and exclamations, as a deuce on him! a deuce of his cane! b. The personification or spirit of mischief, the devil. Originally, in exclamatory and interjectional phrases; often as a mere expression of impatience or emphasis: as, what the (†what a) deuce?, so, who, how, where, when the deuce? (the) deuce take it!, the deuce is in it! Later, in other phrases parallel to those under DEVIL: to play the deuce (with), the deuce and all, the deuce to pay, a deuce of a mess, etc.

In the quotations under a (to which the earliest instances belong), 'plague' or 'mischief' is evidently the sense: cf. the parallel and earlier 'A mischief (a pox, or a plague) on him!' 'Mischief (or plague) take you!' 'What a mischief (pox, plague)!' This meaning is also possible in those under b[1]: cf. the parallel 'What the mischief (or the plague)!' But mischief was personified already before 1700, and 'the Mischief' was in the late 18th c. a frequent euphemism for 'the devil'; that deuce was already taken in this sense in 1708 is evident from Motteux's use of it as = F. diantre, in b[2]. In the other quotations in the same group, 'deuce' plainly takes the place of 'devil' in well-known phrases; but such clearly personified uses as 'the deuce knows', 'to go to the deuce', appear late.

Of, pertaining to, or constituting a second or secondary canon: opposed to protocanonical.

Applied historically to those books of the Scripture Canon as defined by the Council of Trent which are regarded by Roman Catholic divines as constituting a second Canon, accepted later than the first, but now of equal authority.

In the Old Testament they include Esther and most of the 'Apocrypha' of English Bibles; in the New Testament the Epistle to the Hebrews, the Epistles of James, 2nd of Peter, 2nd and 3rd of John, Jude, and the Revelation, and certain verses of Mark, Luke, and John.

deuto-, before a vowel deut-, a shortened form of DEUTERO-, used

1. In Chemistry to distinguish the second in order of the terms of any series. Thus deu'toxide, the second of the series of oxides of a metal, etc., that which comes next to the protoxide, containing the next smallest quantity of oxygen. So deut-iodide, deuto-bromide, deuto-carbonate, deuto-chloride, deuto-sulphide, etc. The prefix has sometimes been improperly used to indicate the constitution of a compound, as compared with that of the proto- or mono- compound of the same series; but it is now obsolescent, being usually replaced by such prefixes as sesqui-, di-, tri-, etc., which properly indicate the constitution.

‖ Devanagari (ˌdeɪvə'nɑ:gəri:), a. and sb. [Skr., Hindī, Marāthī dēvanāgarī (in Bengālī devanāgar), a compound app. of Skr. dēva god + Nāgarī an earlier or a more generic appellation of the same alphabet; lit. 'Nāgarī (? town-script) of the gods'.

Nāgarī is app. the fem. adj. meaning 'of the city or town, urban, urbane, refined' (sc. lipi writing, script), f. Skr. nagara city. Its application to a particular written character can be traced back to the 11th c., when Albirūnī mentions an alphabet called Nāgara, and of a derivative from it called Ardha-nāgarī, i.e. 'half-Nāgarī'. The actual origin and history of the compound Dēva-nāgarī has not been ascertained, any more than that of Nandi-nāgarī, applied to the South-Indian form of the Nāgarī. It has been noted that the terms dēva-lipi 'writing of the gods', and nāga-lipi 'writing of the serpents', occur side by side in a list of 64 kinds of writing enumerated in the Buddhistic Lalitavistara of the 7th c.; but whether these terms have any connexion with dēva-nāgarī is unknown. The 18th c. European scholars who adopted the word, have variant forms from Bengālī or other Indian vernaculars.]

The distinctive name of the formal alphabet in which, throughout northern, western and central India, Cashmere, and Nepāl, the Sanskrit has, for some centuries, been written, as are also the vernacular languages of those regions. device (dɪ'vaɪs). Forms: 3-5 deuis, 4 Sc. deuiss, 4-5 deuys, Sc. dewis(e, -ys(s, -ice, -yce, 4-6 deuyse, diuis(e, dyuys(e, 4-7 deuise, devise, 5-6 deuyce, 6 Sc. devyiss, 6-7 divice, 5- device. [Here two original OF. and ME. words devis and devise have run together. The actual form device represents phonetically ME. devīs, devȳs, a. OF. devis masc., 'division, partition, separation, difference, disposition, wish, desire, will' (Godefroy); 'speech, talke, discourse, a conference, or communication; deuising, conferring, or talking together; also, a deuice, inuention; disposition or appointment of' (Cotgr.); in mod.F. 'action of discoursing, conversation, talk, specification (of work to be done)'. But the form devise (when not a mere variant spelling of device: see below) represents OF. devise fem. 'division, separation, difference, heraldic device, will, testament, plan, design, wish, desire, liking, opinion, conversation, conference, manner, quality, kind' (Godefroy); 'a deuice, posie, embleme, conceit, coat or cognizance borne; an inuention; a diuision; bound, meere, or marke diuiding land' (Cotgr.); in mod.F. 'action of dividing, that which divides or distinguishes, the motto of a shield, seal, etc., an adage'. The two French words correspond to Pr. devis, devisa, It. diviso, divisa, Romanic derivs. of dīvīs- ppl. stem of dīvīdĕre to divide: see DEVISE v.

The older word in ME. appears to have been devis, devys, but devise also appears from Caxton onward, and prob. earlier, at least in the phrase, to devise = F. à devise (sense 12). It is however very difficult to distinguish the two words, since devise, devyse occurs not only as the proper spelling of the repr. of OF. devise, but also, in northern and late ME., and in the 16th c., as a frequent spelling of ME. devis, mod. device. In rimes it is generally possible to separate devise = devis, device, from devise proper, but in other positions it is often impossible; nor does the sense give much help, because in OF. devis and devise partly coincided in meaning, while the English distinctions do not always agree with the French. In later times device gradually became the accepted form in all senses, except in that of 'testamentary bequest', which still remains DEVISE, q.v. There is also some reason to think that in the 17th c. devises (-aɪzɪz) was, in the south of England, used in the plural, when device (-aɪs) was written or at least pronounced in the singular: cf. house sing., houses (-zɪz) pl. The sense-development had to a great extent taken place before the words were adopted in English, so that here the historical and logical orders do not agree.]

Gr. διάβολος, in Jewish and Christian use 'the Devil, Satan', a specific application of διάβολος 'accuser, calumniator, slanderer, traducer', f. διαβάλλειν to slander, traduce, lit. to throw across, f. διά through, across + βάλλειν to cast. The Gr. word was adopted in L. as diabolus, whence in the mod. Romanic langs., It. diavolo, Sp. diablo, Pg. diabo, Pr. diablo, diable, F. diable; also in Slavonic, OSlav. diyavolŭ, dĭyavolŭ, etc. In Gothic the word was masc., as in Greek and Latin; the plural does not occur; in OHG. it was masc. in the sing., occasionally neuter in the plural; in OE. usually masculine, but sometimes neuter in the sing., regularly neuter in the plural deofol, deoflu; but the Northumbrian Gospel glosses have masculine forms of the plural.

The Gothic word was directly from Greek; the forms in the other Teutonic langs. were partly at least from Latin, and prob. adopted more or less independently of each other. Thus ON. djöfull regularly represents an original diabulz. OE. díobul, déoful, déofol can also be referred to an earlier diabul, diavol (cf. It. diavolo), éo coming, through ío, from earlier ía. The OE. déo- would normally give modern dē-, exemplified in 15th c., and in mod. Sc. and some Eng. dialects, but generally shortened at an earlier or later date to dev- or div-. In some, especially northern, dialects, the v was early vocalized or lost, leaving various monosyllabic forms, of which mod. Sc. deil, and Lancashire dule are types.

The original Greek διάβολος was the word used by the LXX to render the Heb. sātān of the O.T.; in the Old Latin version it was regularly retained as diabolus; but Jerome substituted Satan, which is thus the reading of the Vulgate everywhere in the Canonical books, except in Ps. cviii. (cix.) 6 (the Psalter in the Vulgate being the Gallican version from the LXX). Wyclif translating the Vulgate, has in this place 'the deuell', but elsewhere in O.T. 'Sathan'; the 16–17th c. Eng. versions have 'Satan' throughout after the Hebrew.]

1. the Devil [repr. Gr. ὁ διάβολος of the LXX and New Test.]: In Jewish and Christian theology, the proper appellation of the supreme spirit of evil, the tempter and spiritual enemy of mankind, the foe of God and holiness, otherwise called Satan.

He is represented as a person, subordinate to the Creator, but possessing superhuman powers of access to and influence over men. He is the leader or prince of wicked apostate angels, and for him and them everlasting fire is prepared (Matt. xxv. 41).

Besides the name Satan, he is also called Beelzebub, Lucifer, Apollyon, the Prince of darkness, the Evil One, the Enemy of God and Man, the Arch-enemy, Arch-fiend, the Old Serpent, the Dragon; and in popular or rustic speech by many familiar terms as Old Nick, Old Simmie, Old Clootie, Old Teaser, the Old One, the Old lad, etc.

(In this the original sense the word has no plural.)

2. From the identification of the demons, δαιμόνια, δαίμονες, of the Septuagint and New Testament with Satan and his emissaries, the word has been used from the earliest times in English, as equivalent to or including DEMON[1] (sense 2), applied a. (in Scripture translations and references) to the false gods or idols of the heathen; b. (in Apocrypha and N. Test.) to the evil or unclean spirits by which demoniacs were possessed; c. in O. Test. translating Heb. sh'îrîm hairy ones, 'satyrs'.

In the Vulgate, as in Gr., diabolus and dæmon are quite distinct; but the Gothic of Ulfilas already uses unhulþa (Ger. unhold) to render both words, and in all the modern languages, devil, or its cognate, is used for dæmon as well as for diabolus: see DEMON[1].

Also, applied to the malignant or evil deities feared and worshipped by various heathen people (cf. 2 a).

In mediæval conception, devils (including Satan himself) were clothed with various hideous and grotesque forms; their usual appearance, however (still more or less retained in art), was derived from the satyrs of Roman mythology, or from the figure attributed to Pan, being a human form furnished with the horns, tail, and cloven foot of a goat.

devise (dɪ'vaɪz), sb. Law. Also 6-7 device. [a. OF. devise, devis (in same sense):—Romanic devīso, devīsa, for L. dīvīsus, and (late) dīvīsa, from ppl. stem of dīvidĕre to divide, distribute, apportion, also, in med.L., = disponere testamento, to dispose by will. In med.L., dīvīsa was in common use = dīvīsio, originally 'division of goods by testament', 'whence also the testament itself is called dīvīsa [and dīvisio]' (Du Cange). The same word as DEVICE sb., and formerly also sometimes spelt device; the eventual victory of the form devise may be partly due to the influence of the med.L. dīvīsa in wills, but is prob. more owing to the influence of the verb, and the close association of the sb. with it in this special sense.]

The act of devising, apportioning, or assigning, by will; a testamentary disposition of real property; the clause in a will conveying this.

'A gift by will of freehold land, or of such rights arising out of or connected with land as are by English law classed with it as real property, is called a devise. A gift by will of personal property is called a bequest.' (Sir F. Pollock; Land Laws (1887) v. 126) But this distinction is modern: cf. quot. 1641, and DEVISE v. 4.

substantive use of pres. inf. of verb:—L. dēbēre to owe. In Eng. the stress was shifted from (dɛ'vɛ:r) to ('dɛvər, 'dɛ:vər), and this subsequently often spelt devour, devor, deavour: cf. 'Dever occurs as late as the Psalms of Sternhold and Hopkins; but the English tradition of the word died out before 1600, leaving devoir, in 16–17th c. often anglicized as devoyer, but now commonly treated as if adopted from modern French, and pronounced (də'vwɑ:(r), də'vwɔ:(r), 'dɛvwɔ:(r)); though it would be more correct, historically, to pronounce it ('dɛvə(r)) as in endeavour.]

devotion (dɪ'vəʊʃən), sb. Also 3–6 -cion, -oun, -un, -cyon, etc., 5–6 -tioun(e, 6 -syon. [a. OF. devocion, -ciun, -tiun (12th c. in Littré), mod.F. dévotion = Pr. devotio, Cat. devoció, Sp. devocion, It. devozione, all early ad. L. dēvōtiōn-em, n. of action from dēvovēre to devote.

The order of development of the senses in L. was (1) the action of devoting or consecrating (to good or evil) by vow, (2) the condition of being devoted (to something good), devotedness, loyalty, fealty, allegiance, (3) (in Christian use) devotion to God and his service, piety, religious zeal. Only the Christian use passed from ecclesiastical L. into the Romanic langs. in the Middle Ages, and appears (with various extensions) in ME. from OF. After the Renascence, the etymological sense 'action of devoting' appeared in It., Fr., and Eng., at first only in reference to religious matters; in the 16th c. the word was extended to secular persons and things; this is specially noticed as a novelty in French in 1578 by H. Estienne (see Hatz.-Darm.). As all the senses are now in Eng., a logical arrangement without regard to history would follow the order, 8 (including 4); 5 (with 6); 1 (with 2, 3); 7.]

dewlap ('dju:læp). Also 6 dew lop, erron. dew-clap. The English form may be explained as the 'lap' or pendulous piece which touches the dewy surface; but that is not likely to have been the original notion.]

dextro-, combining form of L. dexter, dextra, used in the sense '(turning or turned) to the right', in physical and chemical terms, chiefly having reference to the property possessed by certain substances of causing the plane of a ray of polarized light to rotate to the right. Among these are:

a. dextrogyre ('dɛkstrəʊdʒaɪə(r)) a. [L. gȳrus, Gr. γῦρος circuit], gyrating or circling to the right. dextro'gyrate a. [L. gyrāt-us, pa. pple. of gȳrāre to wheel round], characterized by turning the plane of polarization to the right, as a dextrogyrate crystal. dextro'gyrous a. = DEXTROGYRE. dextro-ro'tation, rotation to the right. dextro-'rotatory a., having or producing rotation to the right; dextrogyrous.

b. dextro-'compound, a chemical compound which causes dextro-rotation. dextro-'glucose, the ordinary variety of GLUCOSE or grape-sugar, DEXTROSE. dextro-ra'cemic, dextro-tar'taric acid, the modifications of racemic and tartaric acid which cause dextro-rotation. Hence dextro-racemate, -tartrate, the salts of these.

dh- is not an English combination, but, in the English spelling of (East) Indian words, is used to represent the Indian dental sonant-aspirate, in the Devanāgarī alphabet dha, also the lingual or cerebral sonant-aspirate, more exactly written ḍha. In earlier spelling by Europeans these sounds were commonly represented by simple d, and in the general rectification of this to dh, the latter has been erroneously extended to several words having simple da dental or ḍa lingual, or to words not really Indian, apparently under the notion that an oriental appearance is given to a word by spelling it with dh. Words thus erroneously spelt with dh are dhooly, dhow, dholl, dhoney, dh(o)urra, dhurrie.

Given by Hamilton Smith in 1827, as the name 'in various parts of the East'; but not included among the native Indian names by Blanford (Fauna of British Ind. (1888), Mammals 143), and unknown to Indian Scholars. If the word tava occurring of date 1470 in Athanasius Nikitin (India in 15th c., Hakl. Soc. 1858) be, as it appears to be, the same word, it would tend to localize the word at Ormus or Hormuz in the Persian Gulf.]

di- (dɪ, daɪ) pref.[1], repr. L. dī-, reduced form of dis-, used in L. before the consonants b, d, g (usually), l, m, n, r, s + cons., v, and sometimes before j, as in dī-būcināre, dī-dūcĕre, dī-gestio, dī-gressio, dī-jūdicāre, dī-jungĕre and dis-jungĕre, dī-lātāre, dī-minuĕre, dī-missio, dī-numerāre, dī-rectus, dī-ruptio, dī-spersus, dī-stinguĕre, dī-strictus, dī-vertĕre. Often changed back in late L. and Romanic popular words to the full form dis-, whence dismiss, disrupt; but in mod. Eng. generally di-. In OF. and ME. often varying with de-, whence defer, demission sb.[2], devise, from L. differre, dīmissio, dīvīsa. This took place especially before a radical beginning with s + cons., where di- was phonetically identified with dis-, and shared in the alternation of dis-:—des- (DE- 6, DES-, DIS-). Thus in ME. desperse, destinct, destill, destrain, destress for dis-; and per contra dispair, dispise, dispite, dispoil, distroy for de-. For its force in composition, see DIS-: it is not, like the latter, a living prefix. The historical pronunciation in an unstressed syllable is (dɪ-); cf. divide, diversion, diminish; but in cases where there is a parallel word in de-, as delate, dilate, it is usually pronounced (daɪ-) for the sake of distinction, and the present tendency is to extend (daɪ-) to other words, as digest, dilute, diluvium, diradiation, direct, diverge, diverse, divest. This seems due partly to analysis of the compound, partly to the influence of stressed forms as 'digest sb. 'divers, in which the i is long and diphthongal.

di- (daɪ, dɪ), pref.[2], repr. Gr. δι- for δίς twice, as in δίγαμος twice married, δίγλωττος double-tongued, bilingual, δίδραχμος worth two drachmas, δίπτυχος double-folded. Hence:

1. Entering into numerous Eng. words, mostly technical, as dichromic, dicotyledon, digamma, digamy, diglot, digraph, dilemma, diphthong, diptych, distich, disyllable; also in the nomenclature of Natural History as Diadelphia, Diandria, Didelphia, Diptera: which see in their alphabetical places. So in Crystallography, as in di-tetrahedron a crystal having twice four sides or planes; so di-hexahedron, etc.

2. As a living prefix, used in Chemistry, with the names of compounds and derivatives, in the general sense 'twice, double', but with various special applications.

a. With the names of classes of compounds, as bromide, oxide, sulphide, cyanide, acetate, chlorate, nitrate, sulphate, amide, amine, etc., expressing the presence of two atoms or combining equivalents of the element or radical, as carbon dioxide CO_2, manganese dichloride $MnCl_2$.

⁋ In the earlier part of the 19th c. the use was different: the Latin prefix bi- was then used, where di- is now, to express two proportions of the chlorous constituent, as in bi-chloride of mercury = corrosive sublimate; while the Greek di- was used to express two proportions of the basic constituent; thus calomel, when supposed to contain two of mercury to one of chlorine, was called a di-chloride.

b. With the names of specific compounds (chiefly organic), indicating a body having twice the formula of a given compound; used chiefly with the names of hypothetical radicals, to indicate the free state of these (supposed to be that of a double molecule), as in di-allyl, dibenzyl, dicyanogen.

In diphenol, the use is less exact, since this substance has not exactly the constitution of two molecules of phenol.

c. With the name (or combining form of the name) of an element or radical, expressing the presence of two atoms or molecules of that body, as in di-hydr(o)-, di-oxy-, di-carbon-, di-carb(o)-, di-nitr(o)-, di-az(o)-, di-chlor(o)-, di-brom(o)-, di-iod(o)-, di-sulph(o)-, di-phosph(o)-, di-bor(o)-, di-arsen(o)-, di-ammoni(o)-, di-amm(o)-, di-amid(o)-, di-cyan(o)-, di-methyl-, di-ethyl-, di-propyl-, di-amyl-, di-allyl-. Used especially in organic chemistry, to indicate that two atoms or molecules of the body take the place of two atoms of hydrogen, as in dibromomethane, dichlorobenzene.

d. These formations (c) are sometimes used attributively or adjectively as separate words, as di-azo compounds, di-carbon series, di-phenyl group. So with other adjectives, as diacid, dihydric, diphenic.

e. On the preceding classes of words derivatives are formed, as diazotize, diazotype, dichromated.

di-, pref.[3], the form of DIA- used before a vowel, as in di-acoustic, di-æresis, di-esis, di-ocese, di-optric, di-orama.

dia-, pref.[1], before a vowel di-, repr. Gr. διᾰ-, δι-, the prep. διά through, during, across, by. [orig. *δϝιγα, from root of *δϝο, δύο two, and so related to δίς, *δϝίς twice (DI-[2]) and L. dis- a-two, asunder (DIS-, DI-[1]).] Much used in Greek in composition, in the senses 'through, thorough, thoroughly, apart', as in διάδρομος running through, διάλεκτος discourse, διάμετρος measure through or crosswise, diameter, διατριβή wearing through or away, pastime, δίοπτρον a thing for looking through, a spyglass. Hence in English, in a few old words through Latin and French, or Latin only, and in many modern scientific and technical words formed directly from Greek, or on Greek analogies.

dia-, pref.[2], in medical terms. In Greek such phrases as διὰ καρύων, διὰ κωδειῶν, διὰ μίσυος, διὰ μόρων, διὰ τριῶν πεπερέων, διὰ τεσσάρων, διὰ πέντε, meaning 'made or consisting of nuts, of poppy-heads, of vitriol, of mulberries, of three peppers, of four or of five (ingredients)', etc., were applied to medicaments of which these ingredients were the chief constituents, the full form implied being τὸ διὰ τριῶν πεπερέων φάρμακον medicament made up of three peppers, etc. By the Latin physicians these phrases were treated as words, thus diachȳlōn, diacissōn, diacōdiōn, diaglaucīōn, diagrydiōn, dialibanōn, diamelilōtōn, diamelitōn, diamisyos, diamorōn, diapente, diatessarōn; and their number was increased by many later formations of the same kind. Their grammatical character tended to be forgotten, final -ōn (Gr. -ων) being taken for -on (Gr. -ον), and then latinized as -um, e.g. diachȳlum, diaglaucium, dialibanum, dihæmatum (δι'-αἱμάτων); or a nominative was otherwise formed, as diapentes. The New Sydenham Society's Lexicon gives about eighty of these in mediæval and early modern Latin.

Several of these are given in French form by Cotgrave; many were formerly in English use, either in their mediæval-Latin form or partly anglicized. Phillips 1678–1706 has 'Dia, a Greek Preposition..set before the names of many medicinal compositions, to which that of the principal Ingredient is usually joined, by Physicians and Apothecaries, as Diaprunum, Diascordium, Diasenna, etc.' Only a few, e.g. DIACHYLUM, survive in modern use: see also, in their alphabetical places, DIACATHOLICON, DIACODIUM, DIAGRYDIUM, DIAMBER, DIAMORON, DIAPALMA, DIAPRUNE, DIASCORD, DIASENNA, DIATESSARON. Among others, are the obsolete dia'carthami (-amy) [F. diacartami Cotgr.], a preparation of carthamus or bastard saffron; dia'cassia, of cassia or bastard cinnamon; dia'cissum [Gr. κισσῶν], of ivy leaves; diaco'rallion, composed of red coral; diacy'minon, diaci'minon [F. diaciminon Cotgr.; Gr. κυμῖνον], composed of cumin; diaga'langa [F. diagalange], made of galanga or galingale; diamarga'riton [also in OF.; Gr. μαργαρίτων of pearls]; †diape'nidion Obs. [med.L. pēnidion, -um (F. penide 'a pennet, the little wreath of sugar taken in a cold') = Gr. *πηνίδιον, dim of πήνη thread. (See Skeat Notes to P. Pl., E.E.T.S. 110.).] dia'phœnic(-on) [F. diaphenicum Cotgr.; Gr. φοινίκων of dates]; di'arrhodon [F. diarrodon Cotgr.; Gr. ῥόδων of roses, διάρροδον (sc. κολλύριον a salve) compound of roses]; dia'rhubarb, a preparation of rhubarb; dia'tragacanth [OF. diadragant, etc. Godef.], preparation of tragacanth; diatrion-pipereon, -santalon, a preparation consisting of three kinds of pepper, or of sanders or sandal-wood; dia'zingiber, -'zinziber, a confection of ginger.

The 17–18th c. diabantite (daɪə'bæntaɪt). Min. [irregularly f. DIABASE (as if the latter represented Gr. διάβας, διαβαντ- having crossed over) + -ITE. Substituted by Hawes 1875 for the Ger. name diabantachromyn.] A chlorite-like mineral occurring in diabase and giving to this rock its green colour.

diabase ('daɪəbeɪs). Min. [a. F. diabase, erroneously formed, since (according to Littré) it was meant to signify 'rock with two bases' (for which dibase would have been a proper form), and subsequently abandoned by its author, Brongniart, for Haüy's name diorite; but in 1842 re-introduced by Hausmann, perhaps with an intended affiliation to Gr. διάβασις a crossing over, transition.]

The name originally given by A. Brongniart to the rock afterwards called DIORITE; now applied to a fine-grained, compact, crystalline granular rock, consisting essentially of augite and a triclinic feldspar, with chloritic matter in varying amount; a variety of the class of rocks called greenstone and trap, being an altered form of basalt.
